The Age of Crusades

The conquering armies of the Prophet emerged from the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century and swept across North Africa and the Middle East, destroying the Sassanid Empire and severely damaging the Byzantine Empire. However the Byzantines held on, and in the West, the tide of conquest was at last halted by Charles Martel and the Franks, at Tours (or Poitiers) in 732 AD.

For three hundred years, Christian forces slowly regained some small parts of the lost ground in Northern Spain and, under resurgent Byzantium, in the Levant. But the Byzantine Empire was gradually weakened by economic decline and internal dissention, and in 1071 AD it suffered a disaster when the Emperor Romanos IV Diogenes was captured during his defeat by Alp Arslan and his Seljuk Turks at Manzikert. Most of Asia Minor was lost, and it seemed that the heathens would soon be at the gates of the city. Michael VII appealed to the Pope for aid in 1074 AD, but none was forthcoming.

Over the next twenty years, Byzantium recovered somewhat under a new Emperor, Alexios I Comnenos, but was unable to retake the offensive. As part of his search for allies, this Emperor too sought assistance from the Christian West, by appealing to Pope Urban II for aid against the Seljuks in 1095 AD.

The Pope must have seen an opportunity to strike against the Moslems while also demonstrating his religious superiority over the Patriarch of Byzantium. He called a conference at Clermont in France at which the enterprise was discussed, and as a result he called for good Christians to go to the East. All who answered the call would be granted the remission of all penances due for their sins.

The focus of Urban's call was not military aid to Byzantium, but the reconquest of the Holy Land so that access to Jerusalem could be regained for the faithful. A number of wealthy French magnates answered the call, and the First (and most successful) Crusade left in 1096.

Over the next 280 years there would be a total of nine crusades to the Middle East. In addition various Popes called for crusades against other foes, some religious and some more political, against the Wends, the pagans of Latvia and Estonia and the Albigensian heretics, to name a few. The "Northern Crusades" enjoyed considerable success, but none of those mounted against the Moslems were nearly as successful as the first, which succeeded in capturing Jerusalem and setting up the states of Jerusalem, Antioch, Tripoli and Edessa. Some of these Christian outposts would survive for nearly 200 years.

The most famous confrontation during the period was probably that between Richard I "the Lionheart" of England and Saladin, but Richard was unable to break the growing impetus of the Moslem counter-offensive and Saladin it was who recaptured Jerusalem.
